Supply Chain Management has to do with the designing, planning, executing, controlling and monitoring of supply chain activities. It has to do with the activities that are being carried out in order in order to ensure that information, products and services get to the final consumer.

It is being observed that organizations rely on the supply chain in order to compete in the global economy and networked environment. As we all know that the world is a global village and businesses are looking for ways to carry out transactions beyond their immediate environment.

Therefore they will rely on another organization in order to ensure that products and services purchased get to the recipient. This will continue to increase sales and boost the turnover of the organization in the long run.

E-commerce impacts....

With the advent of the internet, there have been considerable changes in the way we look at the supply chain in organizations. The reason is that it is no longer necessary for the buyers and sellers to meet face to face before transactions can actually take place. Let me now look at eight major ways that e-commerce has affected supply chain management practices.

#1 Cost-effective

With the advent of e-commerce, there has been a considerable reduction in the price of products and services. It has become difficult for organizations to inflate the price of products and services. This has also reduced some associated costs that would have been added had it been both the buyer and seller meeting face to face.

#2 Flexibility

Supply Chain Management has also introduced flexibility in managing the supply chain system. It has also given organizations the ability to choose the Distributions or logistics companies that they would like to transact business. It also allows organizations to come up with innovations that would assist them in saving costs as well.

#3 Customer orientation

Another amazing thing about supply chain management is the fact that it has changed customers' orientation totally. Before an average customer have the mindset that you cannot purchase a good product online without visiting the stores but after an encounter with good e-commerce sites, many customers have realized that it is possible for both online and in-store customers to have the same experience.

#4 Shipment tracking

Before, when you use the continual method of shipping products and services, you might not really know when your shipment arrives or how long it will take to get what you have ordered. That has become history. Now, when you purchased a product or service online, it is very easy for you to follow up and know the expected time that you are likely to receive your shipment. This has boosted the confidence that the buyer has in the seller.

#5 Shipment notice in advance

Also, with the introduction of supply chain management in e-commerce, the customer can now get a notification when the product is about to be shipped to the buyer. This will also increase sales and up-selling. It will also boost the confidence that the buyer has in the seller as well.
